How WFP's School Feeding programme is helping Nazanin to achieve her dream

In the Afghan tradition, girls are more likely excluded from education. Poverty, early marriage, cultural and traditional views are amongst the factors driving educational inequality and hindering the prospects of girls. Despite the challenges faced by Afghan girls, some are determined to stay in education and obtain professional qualifications—girls like Nazanin, a young refugee student.

Nazanin is a shy 11-year-old student in primary school in Saveh settlement. She is very clear on her career aspirations. Nazanin wants to be a doctor when she grows up. "I don't want anyone to be sick and I want to help my fellow citizens, I want other girls to learn and get educated as well."

Nazanin lives with her mother and eight brothers in a tiny house in the settlement where they struggle financially since her father passed away years ago. Her mother is old and cannot work constantly, which is why WFP's assistance plays a major role in her family economy.

"When you are hungry you have neither energy to work or go to school, nor desire to learn." Says Bi Bi Shah, Nazanin's mother. For Bi Bi Shah, a mother of nine, the school feeding programme is essential for the future of her children because the snacks provided to them are the only nutritious meal they may receive in the day. "I really appreciate this programme, because at least I'm sure my kids don't go to school on an empty stomach." School snacks mean a lot to many children living in settlements. Today, thousands of boys and girls are benefitting from WFP's school feeding programme which prevents them from being victims of child labour and losing out on their childhood.

As a result of the Education Incentive initiative, girls like Nazanin have become nurses, teachers and doctors and are serving their fellow citizens inside the settlements and in the host community.
